

RUSSIA HAS APPEARED OF REVOLUTION.

News, such as it is, continues to be received about the disturbed state there is in Russia over political conditions. What will be the end of the revolutionary feeling there is in the country is at this time conjectural.

The feeling seems to be more general and more intense than it was at the beginning of the disturbance, which gives to the movement an appearance of precedent arrangement.

The unrest there has been in that country for the past three decades is not at this time assuming to a continuance of absolute government. Peter the Great is not there, nor is the spirit he possessed to be found in the men who govern in the name of the Czar. There is not the determined will among the rulers of Russia that was in the earlier monarchs of the Empire.

Much of the original barbarism remains in the people that was so fully developed in Peter, the real founder of the Empire, but it has been largely neutralized in its action in the century and a half that has passed since Peter's imperious will made men stand still when he applied its force upon barbarians in the north.

Education has had its modifying influence upon the rough side, which was always out where it could be seen for many years after Peter had ceased to reign and rule over the north in Asia. As education became more general in Russia, and more enlightened and liberal forms of government were secured, the people were more liberal in their attitude toward the people of the country and the force has been made to be more liberal in their attitude toward the people of the country.

The people of Russia are the people who were directed against the will of the Czar which was not one of the more elevated methods of making it known, but it was a means through which they made their wishes known to the monarch and to those who ruled in his name. All enterprises have their beginnings and a manifestation of the active liberal ideals of the people of Russia had to have its beginning through action in some form. While the form through which the desire of the people was made known could not be approved by civilized and cultured people, yet it is learned that the manner of approach to revolution against an absolute government by seeking the life of the monarch is in line with the system adopted and practiced from the time the first efforts were made at organized government. It is problematical respecting a continuance of the effort to revolutionize Russia at this time till a revolution is accomplished, but there are not two ways upon which it is advancing.

There is but one goal to which effort of a revolutionary nature is tending, which is to a more liberal form of government. Whether the succeeding form will be a limited monarchy or a republic when a revolution is secured will depend largely upon the violence of the means used to effect the desired end. Should the means used be of a violent character the government will be a republic. Should the work be of the more mild type, the new form will be a limited monarchy.

The more strong the feeling is in opposition to the present form, the more violent will be the manner and work connected with its overthrow. The more resistance there is brought against the people should they succeed, the more radical will be the change in the form that will be adopted by them to succeed the absolute form. Should the feeling against the monarchial form approach in intensity the feeling of the people of France when the revolution was made in that country, the future government of Russia will be a republic in form and in a fact.

There is a difference in the mental make-up of the people of Russia and the people of France which will have its influence upon the cause and effect of the revolution. The people of France are more sprightly in their mental make-up and action than the people of Russia, which gives more prompt effort than can be expected in the people of the north. The difference there is in the people may be illustrated by the fact that the people of France would make and accomplish a revolution while the Russians were thinking upon the means to be employed in doing the work, but there will be a solid movement by the Russians when they do get to going that the people of France could not sustain in an animal sense; but so long as it remains a question of intellect the French would sustain twice the weight that the people of Russia could maintain under like conditions.

Were the revolutionary movements going forward in France that are going forward in Russia, there would be a flash of the business one way or the other in short order respecting the fact of revolution. There is not any doubt in well informed circles in Russia about the revolutionary spirit there is among the people, but the problem remains unsolved regarding the time there will be an effort made by the people to remove absolutism.

OUR VERDI LETTER

A Batch of Interesting Items by a Journal Correspondent.

The Verdi Lumber Company does not pose as a philanthropic corporation. It does business on business principles, but it must be said that the company treats its employees in a manner worthy of the highest praise. Its skilled workers, such as carpenters and masons engaged on construction work have furnished rooms equal to those in many hotels and sit at tables where only the best and most wholesome food is served. The charge for room and board is ridiculously low.

H. L. W. Knox is superintendent of the boarding house and he is ably assisted by Mrs. LaPoint and Miss Lippencott. Everything about the place is scrupulously neat. The reading room is greatly appreciated by the men. Three commodious bunk houses are occupied by the graders and track-layers. While the accommodations are not as elaborate as in the single rooms, they are neat and comfortable.

Metropolis of Carson Valley.

Geo. I. Lamy, editor of the "Record" of Gardnerville, Nevada, passed through from San Francisco, Sunday morning. He says Gardnerville is the coming town of Nevada and points to the better shipments of about fifty tons each month. It always brings the highest price in California markets. The business is progressing to such an extent that very shortly a new and larger creamery will have to be built. Nevada is the banner State for butter and where we now have four or five creameries, there should be fifty or more.

Gambling in the Chinese Quarter.

It has for some time been rumored that a faro game was in active operation in Chinatown and that fan-tan devotees had no difficulty finding a game. There must have been something in the rumor, for yesterday, as a sequence of a visit by the officers, a gambling license was taken out by Sas Lee & Co.
The officers are to be commended for chasing up this game. If they continue to keep a sharp lookout they may dig up at least one more hundred dollar license.
